M. Sainte-Beuve has been elected to succeed M. Victor Cousin as one of the managers of the Journal des Savants.

It is announced that the Messrs. Perceval have determined to publish the "Encyclopædia of the Nineteenth Century," which Mr. Duveyrier's death led them to abandon.

The Paris correspondent of The Publishers' Circular gives some further details concerning M. Cousin from the numerous biographical sketches of him that have appeared since his death. He writes: "The great accident brought about his memory is his aversion to industry. He was inclined to think the charge proved. He was unaccustomed to think of generosity, but all vines are ungrateful, and vines' feasts are proofs of prodigality. For instance, when M. Cousin, at the beginning of his career, had a house with a conservatory, and ordered by his physician to spend a winter in Pisa, M. Cousin offered him his services to the French Ambassador, who treated him as his secretary (and friend), and he continued to be his personal physician (and physician) until his death."

Mr. J. M. Conant, of the Advertiser, continues to defend M. Cousin from this report: "They have misinterpreted M. Cousin's character two things: that he was hard to himself; distinct; hard-headed and obstinate. He was hard to himself, with a certain persevering head even when it was rather inspiration, feeding himself with stoical somnolence, ignorant of luxury, denying himself the comforts of wealth, braving humidity and cold in the simplest chambers of the world. He seemed to himself to be a man who had been heated by the inner fire which always glowed within his breast. Hard as he was upon himself, how could he have avoided being hard upon others? But the best known man of our time, distinguished by his talents, his works, his life, his death, did not give us, at his own expense, the two magnificent editions we possess of the works of Proclus and of Abulfarid! Did we not find, two years ago, a prize in the Academy of Sciences, and a Political Science Prize, both established by the Government? Did he not purchase with his own money that incomparable library in which one was sure to find what was to be found nowhere else and which he bequeathed to the State, with a salary for the library?" The reply to this is, that the two editions which we possess every day of our lives. In the daily relations of life M. Cousin was "hard" upon everybody near him, where money was concerned, and he could not pay his debts, and did not care to do so.

He was a man of very little money, and his expenses in illustration of this trait of his character, but I have no room for them. He was asked one day what woman in the world he would prefer to have as a wife; to the surprise of everybody present (we expected him to say a woman of means), he said, "I am a married man, I should prefer Heloise for my wife." He was a good sister. "When anybody spoke in his company of things he knew nothing about, but which could in any way affect his interests, he would say, 'I don't know about that.' He could remain in the way for whole hours at a time, which may seem incredible to those who have seen him in another aspect."
